MMI marches into future with renewed vigor

By Becky Todd
Staff Writer

MILLERSBURG — In the early morning darkness, the uniformed cadets dutifully gather in the snow-covered parking lot of Millersburg Military Institute, forming into small companies to file into the nearby cafeteria.

In the dining hall of Kentucky's only remaining military school, the cadets wait in an orderly line for their turn, their hands crossed behind their backs.

Later, after breakfast, the 76 young MMI residents again file out into the cold for their drill and flag-raising ceremonies, joined by another 20 students who attend the school only during the day.

For Cadet Lt. Col. Danny Dampier, who will soon turn 18 and is serving this year in the school's highest student position as battalion commander, the order and discipline that is expected by his teachers and peers at MMI is the best preparation for life he says can be found.

Rose Mary Stamler, 15, says that her 4½ years at the school have given her "some discipline I wouldn't have had," and her position this year as platoon leader has given her respect from her peers.

A decade ago, military school life was rejected by thousands of young people across the country. The anti-war sentiment generated by the Vietnam War, among other things, caused enrollments to decline dramatically at MMI and at the nation's other military schools.

But unlike many of the military schools that were forced to close during those years — including the state's oldest, Kentucky Military Institute, in 1971 — MMI held on.

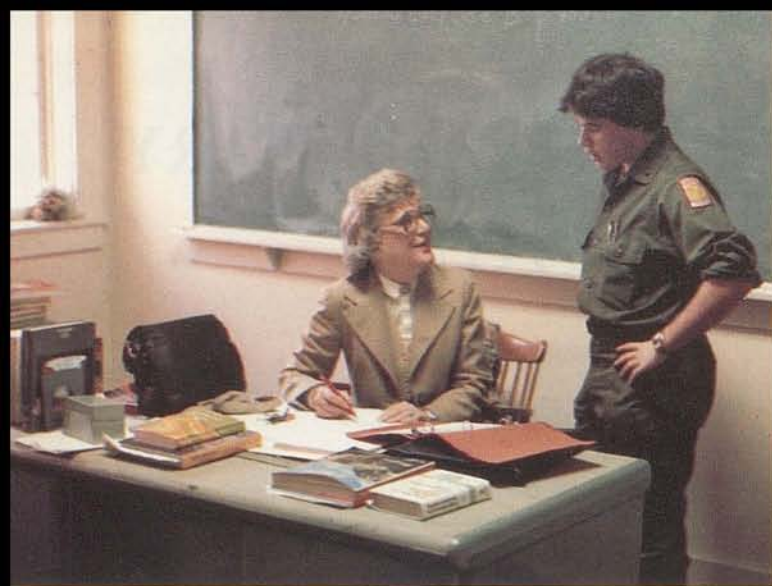

This year, the school is enjoying its largest opening enrollment since before the Vietnam War era.

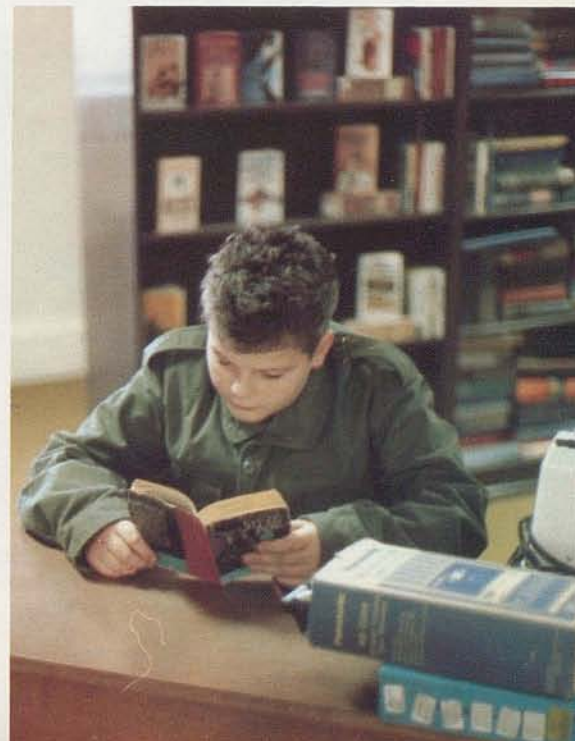

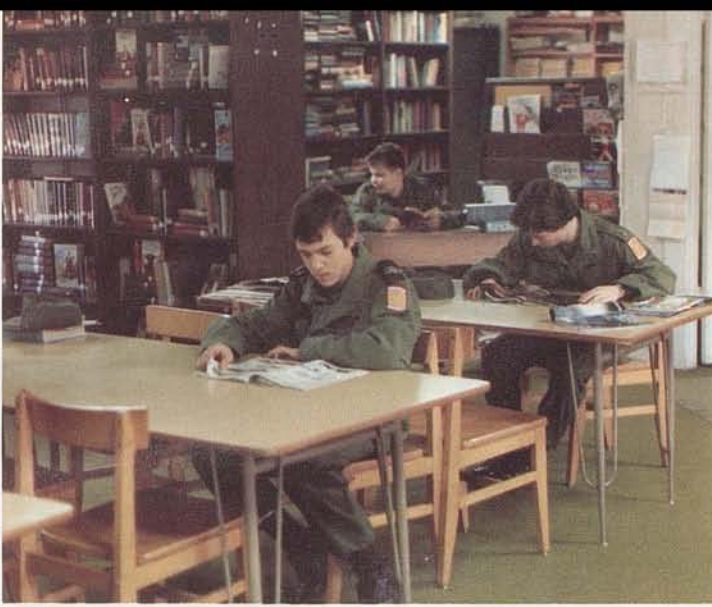

MMI held on because supporters of the school, founded in 1893 and located in the small, picturesque Bourbon County town of Millersburg, would not let it die.

Herald-Leader/Frank Anderson

MMI enrollment has done

The junior school, grades one through six, was closed in 1975. Four years ago, the school's board of trustees was forced to raise $40,000 just to keep the school open another year, and no teachers were given raises that year so the doors could remain open, said Dick Letton, a 1967 MMI graduate who now serves as the board's chairman.

Then in late 1979, an anonymous donor pledged $250,000 over a five-year period to establish an endowment, provided MMI raised a matching $500,000 during the period.

The endowment campaign already has raised more than $72,000.

For the 1,200 citizens of Millersburg who have grown used to watching the cadets marching across the campus, that is good news.

"The school has been here so long that if they didn't have it, they would be lost," said Millersburg Mayor Karl Lusk Sr., whose 36-year-old son, Karl, is among the school's 2,000 graduates.

Dr. Alan Saunders, who became president of MMI last summer, agreed with others associated with the school that "there's a turnaround coming" for MMI and military schools in general.

"Vietnam about killed it," Saunders said last week while sitting in his office in the school's historic administration building.

"People got anti-military, anti-taking orders. We went through a period when what we did at military schools wasn't in vogue."

The tide has been turning for the last several years, said Maj. Gen. W.D. Crittenberger, executive director of the Association of Military Colleges and Schools of the United States, based in McLean, Va.

Enrollments at the association's 30 elementary and secondary military schools that survived the Vietnam period — and 10 to 20 schools did not — are on the upswing for several reasons, Crittenberger said.

"Just old-fashioned patriotism" and "President Reagan's interest in national defense" head Crittenberger's list.

Supporters of military schools, such as Lt. Col. Gordon Betts, who spent 42 years at MMI, say they "still have a place in society."

"There are small classes and individual help and a lot of children just need that type of training," said Betts, 74, a 1928 MMI graduate who then was "everything from janitor to president" at the school until retiring to Versailles in 1973.

Col. F.H. Hall, who has lived and taught at MMI for the last 25 years, agrees.

"The old-fashioned virtues of discipline and toughness of body and mind are just as valid today as they were," said Hall, 55, who says military schools were "unjustly" criticized during the Vietnam era.

Even 17-year-old David Stevens of Illinois, who acknowledges that he does not like the military aspect of the school and found it hard to adjust to being given orders by his peers, said he will probably look back on his year at MMI and "not look down on it."

But the MMI of today, like other military schools, has been forced to make some changes. Women cadets now attend. MMI has four women this year who attend as day students.

This year, MMI's students, who come from Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois and Florida, also includes seven Mexican-Americans and four blacks.

Around 1972, the school stopped teaching battle techniques and staging platoon attacks, said Letton, who attended MMI for 12 years and whose wife, Sandi, teaches social studies at the school. The required Junior ROTC program now is "basically a citizenship course" — a change that Letton and others say is for the better.

MMI board member Bill Stamler, who attended the school for four years in the 1940s, agrees that the "advanced Boy Scouts" approach is an improvement. "I don't think we have any business teaching war tactics."

Stamler's only daughter, Rose Mary, attends the school and has some interest in attending a service academy. His wife, Ellen, teaches at the school.

Saunders, who came to MMI after a year as dean and interim president of a Virginia military school, Randolph-Macon Academy, hopes to re-

an about-face since Viet era store the proud tradition MMI has enjoyed for much of its 89-year history.

Saunders, 43, the school's third president in three years, said he plans to stay at MMI at least until his 12-year-old son, Jeffrey, now an eighth-grader, is through the school. Saunders' wife, Margaret Ann, a former college math professor, has joined MMI's 16-member faculty.

Board members are confident that Saunders is the man for the job. Unlike many of those who served as MMI president, Saunders is not a military man. But board members point to his background — an undergraduate degree in accounting from the Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University, a doctorate in education from Duke University — as evidence he can get the school back on a sound financial footing.

"He said he'd rather have 70 good people than 90 with some bad ones," said board member Frank Dawahare of Lexington, a 1946 MMI graduate.

Dawahare, and two of his younger brothers, Martin and Hoover, practically grew up at MMI. They were sent there in 1940, a year after their mother's death, and all graduated from the school. Later, a fourth brother, A.F., came. And currently, Hoover Dawahare's son is enrolled in the school.

During the lean enrollment years that began in the late 1960s, the school took in some students "just to fill beds" that Saunders admits should not have been enrolled. And because the school needed to keep the students for their tuition, troublemakers were tolerated and it became "a little hard to enforce the rules because youngsters pick up on that," Saunders said.

And once "one or two get in trouble, you get a bad reputation. Reputations are funny things, once you get a bad one, based on one or two kids, it's hard to get rid of," he said.

Already this year, Saunders has expelled nine students, including seven for drug use, the only thing that results in immediate dismissal.

"We've had to come in and get tough. We've taken a no-nonsense approach, and a lot of people aren't doing what they did last year," he said.

Next year, Saunders said the cadets are all "going to be more polite. Next year, they're all going to be saying 'Yes sir,' and 'Yes, ma'am.' We're trying to teach them manners."

Saunders also hasn't been bashful about asking alumni and friends of the school to help out financially. One friend is going to pay for putting a new ceiling in the cafeteria. Another donated a van and then a bus, which Saunders used recently to take some cadets to Lexington to see the popular movie "Taps," based on life in a military school.

He also has gone to court to get $11,000 owed by a student's family that failed to pay tuition, Saunders said.

Tuition, room and board this year at the school cost $4,900, up 10 percent from last year. But adding in other items, such as haircuts and dry cleaning uniforms, total expenses per year run nearly $5,700. Saunders expects tuition to go up another 10 percent next year.

"Kern"

Teacher, sailor, medic, coach. Kern is all of these and many more. Kern has enriched the lives of many Cadets through classes in vocabulary, literature and writing, not to mention the informative tidbits thrown in here and there.

In his 26 years at MMI, Kern has done many things, including: wrestling and tennis coach, the sponsor of the National Honor Society, and publisher of Column Write. In the world outside of MMI, he is a sailor and published author.

Kern is a friend to all the Cadets - he signs week-end passes and corrects backhands; and, though he doesn't have to, he runs around the football field, and like any Cadet counts the days until vacation.

Oh! yes. The Corps of Cadets is very fond of Kern; this is why his "knotheads" respectfully dedicate the 1982 Sniper to him.

MMI Tip-Off Tourney

BASKETBALL 1981-82

The Cadets finished the 1981-82 basketball season with an 11 and 13 lost record, the first losing season under Coach Mike Reitz. Although the record was not as impressive as the previous two years, the schedule was one of the most demanding that the Cadets have played in the last decade.

Once again MMI won an invitational tournament (The MMI Tip-Off Tourney) defeating Deming and Bracken County. Over the last two seasons the Cadets have captured three championship trophies.

Probably two of the most heart-breaking defeats came at the hands of arch-rival Paris High School, the 10th Region Runner-up. The Greyhounds defeated the Cadets 63-59 in overtime at Paris and 56-54 on a last second tip-in to beat MMI out of the District Tournament.

Coach Reitz Comments:

"First of all, I beleive that our players played as close to their potential as possible. It was a tremendous adjustment playing without All-State Center Alonzo Linner and I thought our players adapted extremely well after the Christmas Holiday. Our biggest victory came on February 19, when the cadets defeated Burgin making it the 50th win for Millersburg Military Institute over a three year span. I feel this is a great accomplishment for our players, school, and community. It is very gratifying to see young men strive for a goal and attain it. It has been a pleasure working with these young men, as much as any team I have coached over my 10 year career."

Mike Reitz
